*In this book, we tried to research which of
the underwater inhabitants love divers
most of all.*

*In relation to dolphins,
everything is clear and
obvious, but who else?*

Sea seal of course.
They like to make...

...funny faces for divers,

*...and from time to time
they check how securely our fin
straps are fastened.*

*It is not widely known
that divers are also liked by...*

...whale sharks.

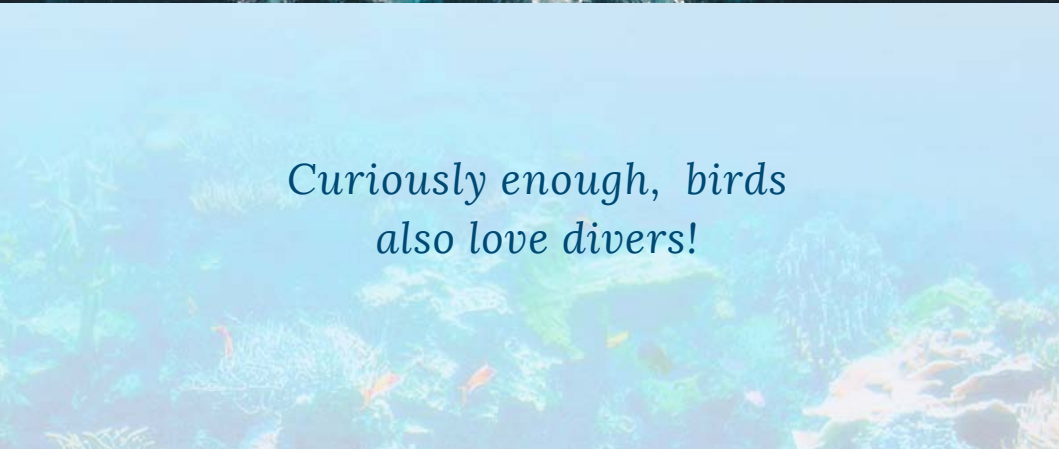

But they are so modest!
That's why they prefer to fill water
in the mouth, and not spill
the beans about it.

*Curiously enough, birds
also love divers!*

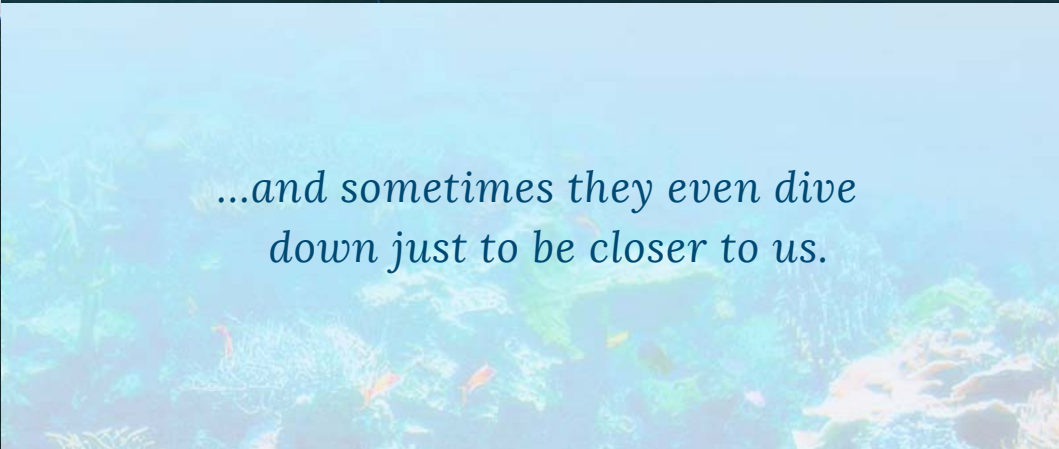

*They like to observe us
under water,*

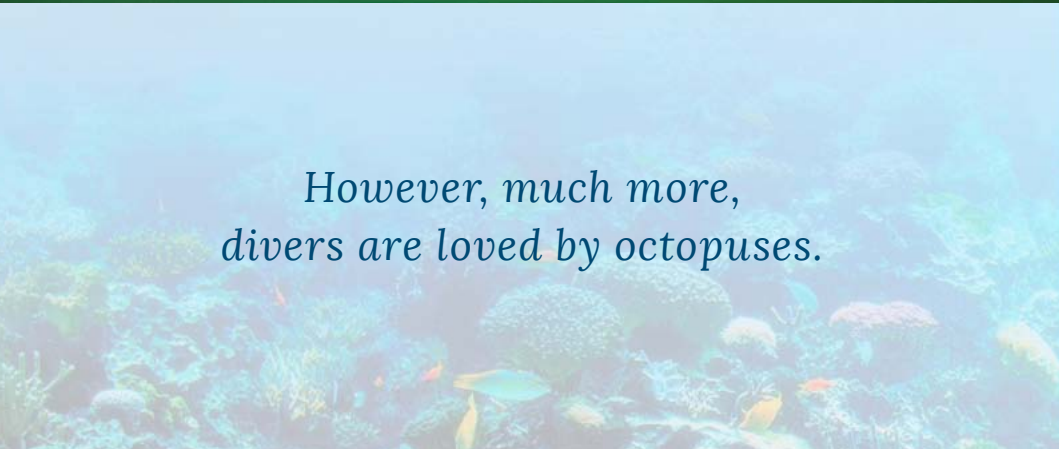

*...and sometimes they even dive
down just to be closer to us.*

*However, much more,
divers are loved by octopuses.*

It is reasonable to ask: Why do we attract them?

It's quite simple really. These animals are very creative and they want to learn from divers; for example...

...how to make underwater photos,

...or how to dance.

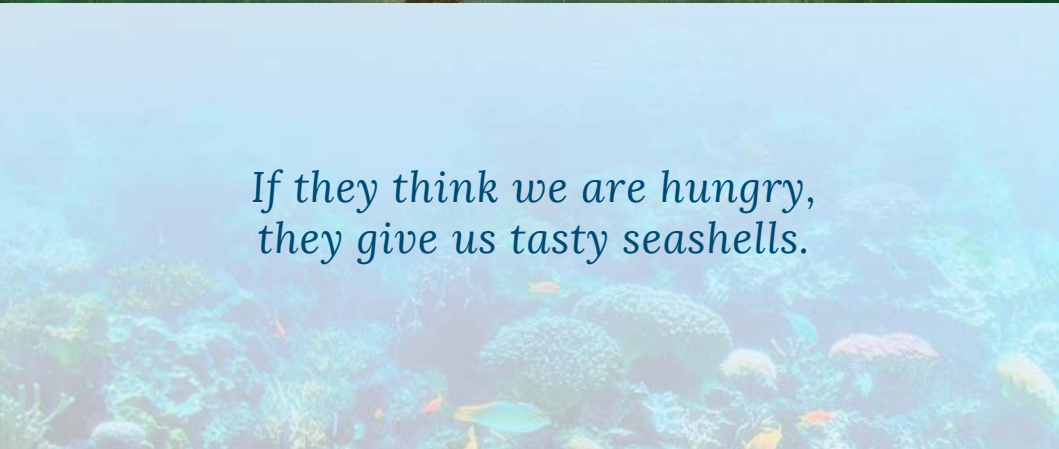

Octopuses are very attentive. If we look distressed they gently stroke our face with their tentacles to soothe us.

If they think we are hungry,
they give us tasty seashells.

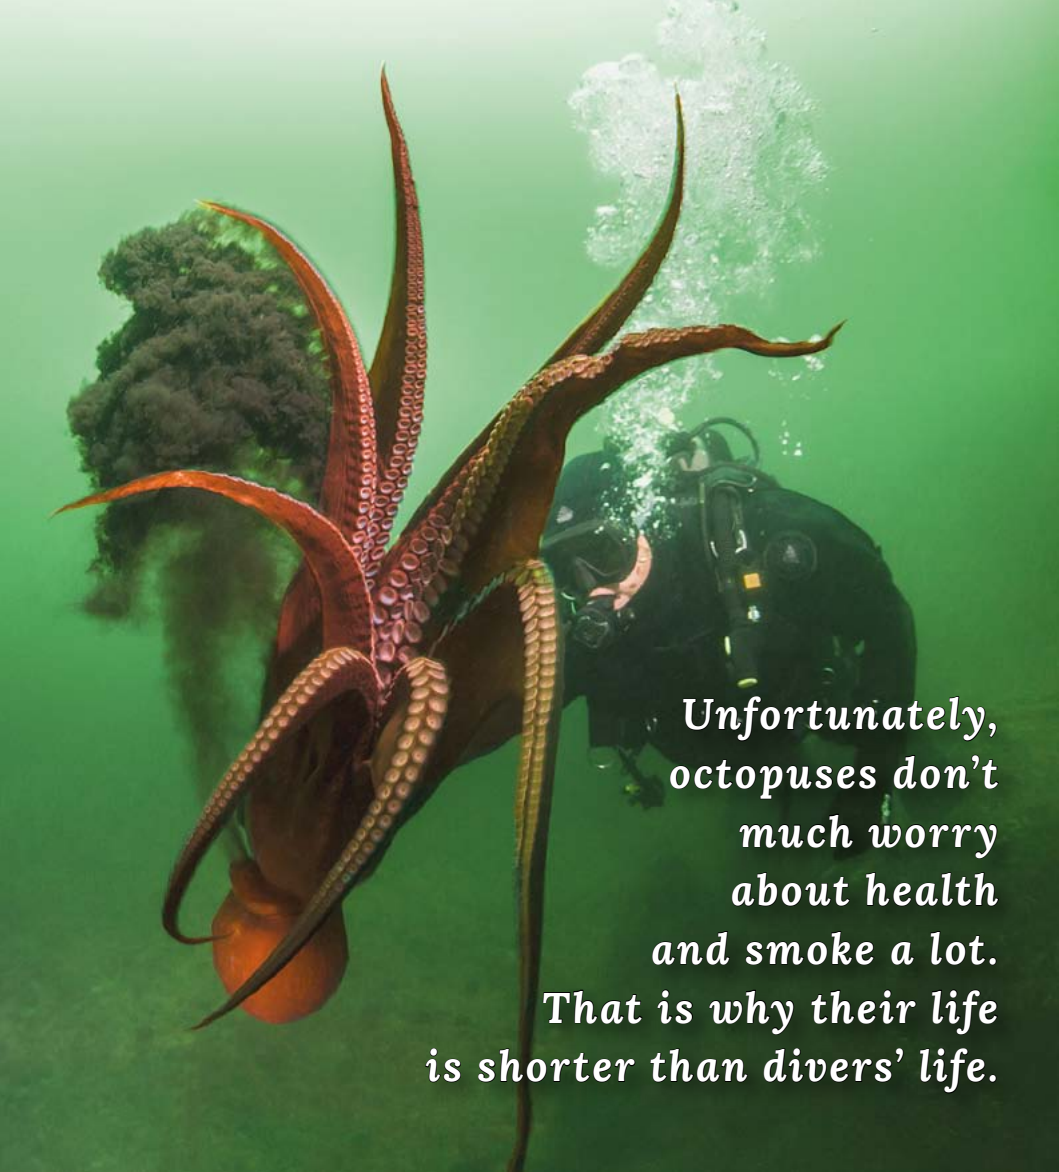

*If something gets stuck in our
mouth – they offer their own
special toothpicks...*

*...and when it starts raining –
they put up an umbrella
over our head.*

A diver in full gear is positioned next to a large, reddish-brown octopus in a green, murky underwater environment. The octopus is holding a lit cigarette in one of its tentacles, and a large plume of dark smoke is rising from it. Bubbles are visible around the diver's head.

Unfortunately,
octopuses don't
much worry
about health
and smoke a lot.
That is why their life
is shorter than divers' life.

A large octopus with pinkish-orange tentacles and a yellowish-brown body is swimming underwater. The octopus is positioned in the center of the frame, with its tentacles spread out. A diver is visible in the background, partially obscured by the octopus. The water is a deep green color, and there are some bubbles visible near the octopus's head.

*At the same time,
they are very soulful
and like to converse
in whispers with us
face to face.*

*They also like to take divers
for a ride under water.*

In other words, we always have a good time with these amiable octopuses.

However, octopuses only rank in second place in regard to underwater creatures who love divers the most. So, who is in first place?

Jellyfish, of course!

Yes! Don't be surprised by this.

They
can't say us
about this
or express
their love
in a different
manner,

*... that is why they just quietly
swim around admiring us.*
